MISBEHAVIOUR
50 artists from Britain and beyond transgressing the norm
CMR GALLERY REDRUTH  8 TO 29 OCTOBER 2014

is an exhibition project curated by London artist and curator Katja Rosenberg (Art Catcher), kindly supported by the community art projects ArtEast and Southbank Mosaics and hosted by artist-led exhibition space CMR Gallery in Redruth, Cornwall.

The project features contributions by members of CMR and other artists from Britain including London, Manchester, Cambridge and Margate, as well as from from Germany, France, Slovenia, Portugal, New Zealand and the United States.

ArtEast is a budding social enterprise at Bromley by Bow Centre led by Artist Frank Creber. Arteast exists to develop creative, social and enterprise skills in individuals with learning and physical disabilities through collaborative working with artists and volunteers. ArtEast came up with the dog theme because dogs are led by their instinct into misbehaviour, in fact closer scrutiny often reveals that it is the dog owner that needs training since they are in a power relationship and often lack knowledge and understanding.

ArtEast member Yasemin says “We called the dog ‘Geo’, we made him pink since he likes being unusual, different and we were also listening Pink Floyd’s song when we chose the colour for him, he likes being a rebel dog, he wants to look different from the others to show the world he doesn’t agree with the “dog’s rules”.”

The scientific community is using a peer review process to ensure the quality of knowledge it produces and publishes. Experts judge the manuscripts submitted to a journal for publication and the editor of the journal makes the final decision. In particular groundbreaking knowledge often has to face strong opposition. An academic dispute is an important part of the scientific endeavor, but what if the peer review process itself is flawed?

Douglas P. Peters and Stephen J. Ceci misbehaved and resubmitted twelve papers that had previously been published by scientific journals back to these very same journals. They thereby tested what should not be questioned: the quality of the reviewers and editors. Three papers were identified as resubmissions right away, but nine papers made it into the review process undetected.

Eight of these previously accepted papers were rejected due to a “lack of scientific quality”. Peters and Ceci demonstrated that the experts’ opinions were inconsistent and that the authority that is given to them might not be justified. Peters and Ceci submitted the results of their study to a relatively new journal “Behavioral and Brain Sciences”. The editor did not only manage the peer review process for this very special paper, but he also invited a wide variety of scientists to openly comment on the results of study. The paper itself took about eight pages, the commentary took about eighty. The artwork visually summarizes the paper and its commentary in a word cloud. A computer algorithm was used to correlate the size of words with its frequency in the source text. A word that often appears in the original text is formatted using a large typeface and vice versa.
Cam is a series of 12 prints derived from an anonymous online sex-seeking profile. I was drawn toward the specific nature of the profile's photographs, which are displaying what the owner sees as his attributes in order to attract interest. Every photo has been cropped so that either the head or face are missing, which makes these images a different kind of ‘portrait’.

They create very interesting compositions, with different body parts becoming the focus of the image. The misbehaviour here is probably mine, in taking these images and turning them into a different form of public display.

The Grapes of Wrath, John Steinbeck, 1936

A great English phrase to describe behaviour that is not exactly criminal, not always anti-social but rowdy, boisterous, full of youthful energy.

It’s the sort of misbehaviour that makes harrumpers out of people who want a nice quite time reading in the library, or picnicking on the beach or dozing on the train. Sometimes we all need a dose of piss and vinegar to get us going. The installation confronts the viewer with piss and vinegar babies spilling out of two glasses and an invitation to take that impossible drink.

NFS - commissions welcome

This piece is about a very good friend – the figures depict his playful persona – comfortable in his ‘Armani’ clad businessman character, which masks a subversive, edgy alter ego.

The painting is set against the backdrop of the Limehouse Basin and also attempts to capture the new professional emigre now residing amongst the shifting communities of East London.

Lost Faces of Society

Etching - hard ground, soft ground, sugar lift, photo etching 92x30cm framed
£395 (also available individually at £100 each unframed)

This series is a collection of work which examines the extent which humans go to to become part of a social group and the identity and power they wish to portray with their different criminal organisations. The narrative of the life story is etched into their skin with the tattoo needle, similar to the process of mark marking into the metal plate as a surface of skin. The eventual downfall of each character is illustrated over their entire body.
Project RUN looks to use the word 'run' and interoperates it in a variety of different visual ways and meanings. In total there are 645 different interpretations of this word within the English dictionary. Machine has taken over and now we are no longer in control of our own minds as the Roberts march forward and take control of our society.

The central bank controls the way we pay our taxes, the global advertising makes us want to own all the new technological gadgets. This body of work is bold and graphic lending itself to our own inner childhood memories of man vs machine.

There are many ways of interpreting Shakespeare’s words: ‘All the world is a stage and we are merely players.’ I believe each one of us has an important part in writing the script. This picture was created c. mid 1990’s. Twenty years on, how have hearts, minds, and attitudes changed? What today constitutes ‘misbehaviour’? Recently shocking scenes of two American journalists, each about to be beheaded by their Isis captors, rolled out across our world stage. If this is a waking dream it is definitely the stuff of nightmare.

The news this summer was filled with horror and insanity, from beheadings to other atrocities in Gaza, the Ukraine, Syria, Iraq, etc. It would seem as though havoc is being wreaked on nearly every part of the globe. What about an ‘International Day of Love, Light, Peace, Reconciliation, Compassion, Forgiveness’? When our mindset shifts from fear and the pain and suffering it brings, to love and light, the planet will be a much more safe and peaceful place. Where there is love, there is no room for fear. This moment is filled with now.
Working in East London as a teacher, I have seen my fair share of cheeky misbehaviour. These two cormorants are a reminder to us all, not to take life so seriously. A lesson youth understands but as life goes on we can struggle to remember. The coastline is always an inspiration, and this summer I visited the Jurassic coastline of Devon. It could be the constant changes in the light hitting the cliffs, the tide, the erosion, that lifts my spirits but creating art lifts my spirits in the same way. I play with colour and materials, constantly altering, layering and shuffling ideas together. Light-hearted and fabricated; I hope my work makes you smile.

Beyond the padded, high backed arm-chairs, slightly soft digestive biscuits and over-warm temperature of an Age Concern meeting room you will discover a scene to challenge the stereotypical norm. A fridge loaded with beer and banter in bucket loads - meet “The Geezers”, a cheeky yet, charming bunch of OAPs.

In a scene reminiscent of The Last Supper I have portrayed their naughty antics at Appion Court in Bow, East London where they meet weekly.

I have tried to capture the collective spirit of the group and furthermore show the friendship, loyalty and mutual respect between these charming East End boys.
My work is about objects and materials, placing them in situations and dialogues that they normally wouldn't (or shouldn't) find themselves in. For Blancmange, I was interested in the tactile and visual qualities of food, and using it as a substance for play rather than a necessity for survival. The four images which make up the piece are stills taken from a short video of the same name.

I walked from my house, camera in hand to document the state of my local streets (mainly litter strewn). What caught my eye was the frequency of drinks cans left on walls and railings. This echoed with the childhood song ‘Ten Green Bottles Standing on the Wall’. And so, I looked out for 10 drinks cans perched on walls or railings. I thought this would be a playful way to deliver the anti-littering message rather than being preachy.

Inner Landscapes of a Legal Alien

When I heard of the show's motto ‘Misbehaviour', I instantly thought of Konstantin. Not because of him being a lout, but a person, whose behaviour doesn't fit into universal patterns. He is diagnosed with the Asperger Syndrome. When met him in 2008, he was in the fifth grade of the school where I was teaching music and art. What made him special was the freedom of his thinking, for instance, while drawing. To make eye contact or to read facial expressions is not easy for Konstantin. He likes to get precise information about the thoughts and feelings of whom he is talking to. If he has gathered enough information and gained confidence, he is a wise and humorous conversation partner. But there is much more going on inside him! I asked for access to Konstantins inner landscapes, and he granted it to me. My artwork is a dim mirror of the vague impressions I got. I tried to capture the images that emerged in my mind while he was talking.

Kindergarten – The Big Battlefield

Silkscreen on cardboard (Gameboard „Hare and hedgehog”), 66x50cm

In kindergarten Konstantin was called „the professor“ or „the general“, because he lead the „battles“ between groups of children and developed recipes for mud balls.

The lovingly crafted gameboard of one of my favourite’s games appeared before my inner eye, when he enthusiastically described the kindergarten’s site with its trees, hills and hedges.

I replaced the peaceful little kindergarten by Konstantin’s game: The Big Battlefield. The visitors may choose and take away gamecards with three different characters they might like to be. Who wants to be the general?

I Like Symmetry

Silkscreen on Strohseide, 50x70cm

Like a rockstar of the seventies Konstantin is placed between some psychedelic patterns and proclaims his beliefs. Typeface and meanings of the words are quite the contrary to design and colour of the patterns. Despite his preference for logic, information and consistency, Konstantin faces a bewildering variety of possibilities flashing all around him.

My Mind’s Map

Silkscreen on transparent paper, stuck to a pattern sheet, 106x73cm

While listening to Konstantin, the image of a pattern sheet often appeared before my inner eye. In apparent chaos, countless useful things are hidden. Konstantin states that his perception is image based. Like a dog sniffing its surrounding, he gathers many equivalent visual impressions.

Therefore, I’ve given an image to every splinter of his thoughts, blending in with its surrounding.

How Am I To Know

Five objects made of Strohseide 9x12x7cm on metal supports, stand 6x6cm, different heights 25/25/30/35/40cm

Diagnosis Asperger Syndrome? It was one task among the psychological tests Konstantin considered downright grotesque: He had to look at a drawing showing people on the beach and afterwards evaluate on the basis of their facial expressions, how they felt. His commentary: „How am I to know how they feel. I don't even KNOW them!“

It’s an unsolvable task, all faces look alike. Inside, there are noted feelings, but they aren’t apparent to Konstantin. In his mind, the pattern sheet develops considering every possible feeling.

Don’t Talk to Me – Talk to Me

Radio ‘Bobby’ with sound collage of Konstantin’s voice 27x16x12cm

Making decisions is not Konstantin’s cup of tea. There is so much to take into account and to weigh! One of Konstantin’s hobbies is to build stereo systems out of old parts, especially tube amplifiers. Radio ‘Bobby’, built in 1954, speaks his inner voice.

This work is part of an ongoing series that looks at the interchange of power between the state and the individual. Here the fingerprints represent a crossing of society's behavioural rules and in doing so, the dialogue of punishment begins. The ribbons resonate a time of celebration, a special occasion, or remembrance of something lost.
Knickers

Copper tube, car spray paint, knickers
80x13X0.5 inches
£1500

Knickers is part of a body of works I made on my return from a working trip to the Middle East, where I conducted a series of multi-faith workshops. The installation makes use of underwear alluding to the rungs of a ladder.

Many of my works play on our use of language and in this piece I play on the use of the word Knickers as a defensive rebuttal. To say no, for example, to the idea of woman being refused rights and privileges: Refusal of entry into heaven perhaps? Saying ‘no’ is an under-rated, very important part of the learning process, which we, in our desire to be amenable, tend to overlook.

As an aside to the above, this work became highly controversial at its previous viewing culminating in Knickers being censored. It was judged as an act of Misbehaviour to attempt to exhibit the work and it had to be removed immediately after the opening night.
The project brief led me back to that cluttered store of anything which caught my eyes over 10 years or so in the predominant city landscapes which I inhabit mentally and physically. This in turn led to my first artist book, using a commercial format and raw digital images - perhaps an example of an artist ‘misbehaving’?

Moreover, the photograph on page 2 shows a work of art by someone else, one of the magnificent artists of Luna Park in Sydney. Many of the images are celebratory; a few suggest more darkly the results of collective or personal ‘misbehaviour’. I preface and end the book with an admonishing angel.
REMEMBER US

Linocut print and acrylic paint
30x42cm
POA

These linocut prints illustrate a poem by my mother, Eileen, titled ‘Remember Us’. Eileen's inspiration for this poem came from her walks along the country lanes in Ireland along with her interest in Irish history and politics. This poem remembers those who have suffered the consequences of ‘misbehaviour’ in war; victims of famine and religious persecution, their bodies thrown into mass graves and roadside ditches to be forgotten.

Stand still – breathe slowly
Make no sound...
You’ll hear the distant drone of a wasp’s nest – so low down in the desiccated layers of leaves that they’re impossible to see.

But you feel their brooding presence in the cool, dark shade of the hedge-row ditch…
With it’s rotting sludge
as black as pitch.

Then from the ground comes a swelling chorus of voices crying out, “Remember us…”
Bulldozed to eternal anonymity
A startling feat of disciplined efficiency
Proof of the depths of man’s depravity…

Like the bleached remains of long dead trees in the rotting mess of useless Autumn leaves…

Only our fleshless skeletons survive
but our disembodied voices will still rise to the white grey marbled sky and fill the air with our mournful cries…

Reach out and touch the blood-red drops of the fuchsia chandeliers…
then shake the leaves and feel the shower of our glistening wet tears…

Remember us.

Tribute to Vasarely

Repeat the same gesture for a while and you will see how, at a moment, hazard will alter its result. It is an example of how we cannot manage everything even if we try. We are not the complete master of what we are and do.

This small piece of art is called ‘Tribute to Vasarely’ because I consider him as the master of modified perception. It is an example of how misbehaviour in a small gesture can change the aspects of things and can make shapes appear and create movement.

"Here we are again...I never can understand what is our conversation about. It looks like we are condemned to this situation. Rather than a conversation, we can call it two monologues. There are many silences, but both of us start and end each sentence at the same time... I am trying to tell you this over and over, but you never listen... You see? It is happening again and again...."

Smoking Seagull is based on a real seagull in Margate which came and woke me up very early every morning by tapping on my window. The seagulls in Margate are fearless. They raid the dustbins and strewn rubbish all over the place, acting like hooligans. This piece continues my series of portraits of animals exhibiting uniquely human behaviour: shopping, playing with a yoyo, smoking. Smoking is a rebellious act for many, so it is fitting that this seagull has a cigarette in his beak.
Riot is one of a series of politically inspired collages, produced as oil paintings.

- A Riot is a form of civil disorder commonly characterized by a group lashing out in a violent public disturbance against authority, property or people as a result of perceived inequalities and injustices.
- Rioting: get organised through social media, keep in communication, involve the press, record proceedings but avoid surveillance and raise awareness in the face of state attempts at repression and internet censorship.
- Rioting can depose leaders and change the future of a country such as in the capital of Ukraine, Kiev. Britain’s riots that started as a response to the killing of Mark Duggan in 2011, ended with looting, resulting in imprisonment for stealing bottled water.....
I have a studio in a 1902 building located close to a mineral lake in an old resort town called the City of Soaplake, Washington State, US. There are about 2000 resident in the Soaplake area. In Town one finds: 2 beaches, a post office, a library, several craft shops, a laundry mat, a coffee shop, a supermarket, hotels, motels, a gallery that is also a small museum, restaurants, schools, healthcare centre, senior centre, Police station-fire department, several churches, a car repair, 2nd hand shops, bars, apartments, ... The photographs were taken with a Nikon Rebel camera within approximately 10 hours of each other. The same 14 year old appears in both images in the 2nd one as a reflection. There are many teens and pre-teens living in town in apartments with and without supervision, many are school-age but many skip on a daily basis. The small local police department tries to organize some events for them to keep them out of trouble but they vandalize and stage brake-ins and robberies to entertain themselves and not out of need. Many are up and about most of the night and sleep a bit during the day.

Pretty Girl was born in the Spring, under my studio, a big old shed within an enclosed courtyard, her home, my playground. Unlike her mother and sibling she was comfortable with my presence. In the beginning we held short, shy gazes, curious.

Against all official advice, I offered food to this scrawny little scrap of life, she has blossomed. I take photographs, we share an apple. Cunning little fox, she gets closer every day, looks sad when I leave. Our eyes now lock, she trusts, I worry.

I am attracted to misbehaviour and have misbehaved a lot in the past, mostly in a political context; and look forward to misbehaving in the future as I get to look more and more like the sort of person not expected to misbehave. The sort of people I make pictures of misbehave but not in a good or constructive way; they are just there. As I cast my eye around for subjects to portray they stand out; they are the little shits on street corners intimidating everyone and doing crack deals, they are the career criminals living out their violent lives in freefall and the drunks staggering around having scant idea of what they are doing or how they got there.

I make no judgement, they just interest me.
"Have you got a clean handkerchief?" asks your mum, as you head out the door, and the question is asked with love, with apprehension, with hope for the future and pride in the past. Mischief can be a solitary or community passtime, an expression of human ingenuity, and it can be a call for help, a cry for assertion, the last straw.

There is not a great range of mischief expressed in these handkerchiefs, but I know the gallery visitor will think of many more. One here, which may be identified as Knock-down-ginger, is often communal mischief, carried out as a rite of friendship, or possibly a passive aggressive assertion, to say there is life in street, there is no-one respectable calling, and the knockers require no true social interaction with the one who answers the door, who becomes a cypher, a fall-guy, but a potential unmasker and avenger. Elements of danger, of discovery and retaliation are present, do they fill us with glee? While researching these mottos I found many others that could be included, and have unwittingly played the Outlook prank on someone, and had the mobile phone trick played on me, again possibly unwittingly... We learn from these experiences, and are sent out the door ready to take the world on again.
One evening in April my brother and I were invited by Dr. A.P. Harrison, IKVH, Faculty of Health and Medical Sciences, Copenhagen University, to listen to underwater sounds in the sea. This was a wonderful experience which changed our perception of life in the oceans. The loudest sounds we heard came from pistol shrimps.

When in colonies the pistol shrimp can interfere with underwater communication and sonar. This led to the idea of noise pollution and for a mobile featuring misbehaving origami shrimp and water pistol prints. Dr. Harrison recorded the sounds using hand built hydrophones and an SD-722.

What is ‘misbehaviour’? For the tiny, corrupt elite that rules this country, anything that helps them keep their riches and privileges is good; anything that might challenge the huge inequalities in our society is bad. So who’s misbehaving: the disabled person who must not have a spare bedroom to store their wheelchair, or the non-dom billionaire whose 20-bedroom London mansion stays empty 95% of the time? The disaffected youth who steals a pair of trainers, or the casino banks who gamble away other people’s money and then get bailed out by the taxpayer? The fare-dodging casual worker or the tax-dodging multinational? The cleaners striking for a living wage, or the bankers lobbying their politician friends to keep their bonuses?

мат is an obscene but incredibly rich and versatile underground Russian sub-language. Based on four key stems, two denoting male and female genitals, one denoting the act of copulation and one denoting a prostitute. With additional prefixes, suffixes and shift of stress these stems develop into an enormous collection of nouns, adjectives and verbs that become a multi-levelled, multi-functional and boundlessly expressive lexicon.

мат has a rich history, appearing in folklore, poetry and was once pervasive in the gulag, more recently working its way into the mainstream, mass media, literature, film and even opera. On July 1st 2014 the key stems of мат were banned from use in the arts in Russia.

I used traditional russian-style cross stitch to give the words an historical context.
This piece of work is about the decision to behave naturally in the face of an ordered society which struggles to accept exceptions to the rule.

My pieces in this show are from my time at Central Saint Martins - misbehaving selfies that dare to demand attention.

Created before the world went digital, these are the result of experiments with comedy props, analogue film, a darkroom, liquid photographic emulsion, wood, household emulsion, a hacksaw, string, needle and thread… and the darker side of a normally shy, quite friendly, artist.

We note that those who have power and resources often give lip service to care for children and the vulnerable, but our institutions and systems have some way to go before genuine creation of quality of life for all. For sure, life expectancy, health and opportunities have improved from historical times, but they remain skewed towards the few.

Our culture still promotes role models who are macho, quick to anger and intolerant. Modern war largely targets the elderly, women and children in an indiscriminate way and is a crime against humanity.

RIOTERS

Digital giclee print from an original collage
60x60cm
£200 framed

This piece is a facsimile of a collage made for an arts charity, Art Against Knives, just after the London riots which happened when Mark Duggan was shot dead by police. To defuse the sinister tones of the rioters actions, they seem to be dancing and pirouetting about in a lighthearted way, rather than stealing stuff.

Bright colours enliven the atmosphere. It is a piece about moving on, and putting negative events behind us. The ‘let’s pull-together’ attitude that Londoners demonstrated after the riots was inspirational.
We can all relate to misbehaviour; it is fundamental in what makes us human. It can draw people close or divide them for life. It can be humorous or harmful. I am interested in exploring individual boundaries. What is extreme to one can be a mere trifle to another. What influences people to misbehave? There can be many factors or influences within our society; it can be to benefit oneself, to inflict damage or to benefit an organisation. I would like to give people the opportunity to share their confessions and opinions about misbehaviour using different mediums. There will be a private area where individuals can write, draw or paint their recent or past misbehaviour anonymously. All materials will be provided. The roll of paper will spill into the exhibition space revealing all. Throughout the exhibition I will take sentences from the roll of confessions and create artistic interpretations. These will be exhibited throughout the show. Merging my own misbehaviour with yours!

On a daily basis we have to process a lot of written information, whether, driving, cycling or walking, telling us what we can and cannot do. In this ongoing series of images Paul focusses on those signs that seemed, to him, to shout the loudest. He regularly walks past such local authority notices and they state in no uncertain terms what is not acceptable behaviour. The resulting images reflect the incongruous nature of siting such directives in places that otherwise appear quiet and trouble free. It is unclear whether such signs are ignored but Paul has yet to see a dog, ball or pigeon misbehaving.

Misbehaving is a secret occupation. Women of a certain age misbehave in less traditional ways. Sometimes things change. We look outside ourselves and our daily routines; imagine life, love, different worlds, what might be, what could be. Inspiration comes from imagination.

We might cheat in reality or simply in our minds, in our dreams. It's simply misbehaving by degrees. This collection of poems encapsulates a woman’s thoughts. Whether those thoughts are real, acted upon or simply the fanciful art of a poet is left for you to decide...

This film explores human behaviour at night. Taking found footage (CCTV) and creating a film that attempts to show an incessant unremitting response and reaction that could occur in any city in the UK.

A series of photographs that juxtaposes photography of the artist's personal and private objects along with clauses from the government contract that the artist signed as part of his TS(O)*. Thus, creating a simple still life photography that ironically displays that inherent tension and conflict of interests between the artist's true nature as a gay man in Singapore versus the straight-laced societal and governmental expectations and pressure imposed onto him as a scholar.

*TS(O) refers to the "Teaching Scholarship (Overseas)", an award given to selected individuals by the Ministry of Education in Singapore that grants a fully funded Undergraduate education at an overseas university, which upon completion, will require the awardee or "trainee" to return to Singapore and serve as a Ministry of Education employee for 6 years. Failure of fulfilment of service upon graduation will result in a hefty legal penalty.

A cycling family heads out on a rainy night to go food shopping. The bikes are taken out to the front of the house and lights are being sorted as the children stand with their bikes. A noise sends an alarm call to the parents, it's a yell from the eldest, a 7 year old boy. A slow motion moment. My eyes take in the scene. Hooded thieves are taking my sons bike. He's being restrained by one as the others cycle around. I run to him. My husband throws a bike lock at the thief who is holding our son's bike. He drops the bike and hobbles away. The bike is retrieved. My son is comforted and reassured by me, his brother and dad. We call the local police and stay at home for a chip shop dinner.
